

Deportation Appeals

Deportation of Nationals of the European Union (EU)
European Economic Area (EEA)

September 2018

Bail for Immigration Detainees (BID) is a national charity that provides legal advice and representation to individuals held under immigration powers to secure their release from detention. We also provide legal advice and representation to detainees facing deportation. BID works with detainees in all removal centres in the UK, and with immigration detainees held in prisons.

- We provide free legal advice, information and support to immigration detainees to help them exercise their right to liberty and access to justice, and to help them challenge their deportation.
- We prepare and present (free of charge) applications for release on bail or temporary admission.
- We carry out research and use evidence from our legal casework to influence decision-makers, including civil servants, parliamentarians, and regulatory bodies through policy advocacy.

The Article 8 Deportation Advice project (ADAP) is a project that provides free legal advice and representation to individuals challenging deportation on the grounds of their long residence in the UK and/or their family life in the UK.

The right to respect for family and private life is protected by Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

I am an EU/EEA National. Can the Home Office deport me from the UK?

Yes, EU/EEA Nationals can be deported.

The Home Office has to show that a person poses a genuine threat to public security. The Home Office may begin deportation action even if a person does not have criminal convictions in the UK. For example, it may rely on serious past offending in the home country.

Can I use EU law to challenge my deportation from the UK?

EU law provides some protection against deportation. The EEA Regulations 2016 state that EU/EEA nationals can only be deported on grounds of public health, public policy and public security. Different tests apply for the Home Office to meet depending on how long you have lived in the UK.

The length of residence in the UK prior to the decision to deport is relevant to how strong the grounds must be to justify deportation.

- If the EU/EEA national has permanent residence it requires 'serious grounds' of public policy or public security to justify deportation. A right of permanent residence is obtained after a person has lived in the UK for 5 years continuously exercising Treaty Rights (EEA Reg.15).
- If the EU/EEA national is under 18 or has resided in the UK continuously for 10 years prior to the decision to deport, it requires 'imperative grounds' of public security to justify deportation. The person must already have a right to permanent residence before they can benefit from the highest test of 'imperative grounds'.
- If the EU/EEA national has not lived in the UK as a 'qualified person' for 5 years or for 10 years before the decision to deport, the Home Office can deport on grounds of public policy or public security. However the decision must still be fair or 'proportionate' and must take account all personal circumstances including private and family life in the UK.
- A person's previous criminal convictions do not in themselves justify the deportation of an EU/EEA national. Deportation may only be justified where the person represents "a genuine, present and sufficiently serious threat affecting one of the fundamental interests of society" (Reg. 27 (5) EEA Regulations 2016).

Does time in prison automatically break continuity or residence when calculating the 10 years?

No, the period of residence is not automatically broken. This is especially the case if the EU national has already lived continuously in the UK before going to prison.

The key issue is whether the links formed in the UK prior to imprisonment have been maintained. The Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) recently ruled in the case of C-316/16 B v Land Baden-Wurtemberg and C-424/16 Secretary of State for the Home Department v Franco Vomero, that:

an ‘overall assessment of the person’s situation’ must be made when considering whether links formed in society before prison have been maintained. These may include the following factors:

- The strength of the links formed in society before the imprisonment;
- The nature of the offence that led to imprisonment;
- The circumstances in which the offence was committed;
- The conduct of the person concerned throughout the period of imprisonment.

Additional factors that would be relevant include whether or not relatives and friends have visited the person in prison and what other links the person may have kept going with the community at large while in prison.

How can I show that I do not pose a threat to society?

If you were sentenced to more than 12 months in prison, a report on the level and nature of risk you may present should have been done by your Probation Officer. The report is called an OASys report. It is sometimes called a NOMS report. You can ask your Probation Officer for it.

If you have done any rehabilitation courses in prison, it will be important to provide evidence of this to show that you have taken steps to make sure you do not re-offend.

If you have a permanent right of residence, even if you are considered to be a threat to public policy, you have some protection under EU law. If you can show that there are reasonable prospects of successful rehabilitation if you remain in the UK, this will help you to show that your deportation cannot be justified. For example, you may be able to show that you are well integrated in the UK and have a support network of family or friends here who can help you with your rehabilitation, but that no effective support network would be available to you in your home country.

If I have a private and family in the UK, will the Home Office consider this?

Yes. If you have family in the UK who cannot be deported with you because they are British citizens or whose right to be in the UK is not dependent on your right to stay, you may be able to argue that it would be a violation of your right to respect for family and private life to remove you. The Home Office must also consider other issues such as how your deportation would interfere with the private life that you have built up during your time living in the UK.

The right to respect for family and private life is protected by Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the Home Office will have to show that, taking into account the private and family life that you have in the UK, it would still be ‘fair’ or ‘proportionate’ to deport you because of the public interest in removing foreign national offenders from the UK.

Can I get legal aid to help me with my deportation challenge?

Challenges to deportation based on the EEA regulations and on family life and length of residence in the UK are excluded from legal aid. However, you may be able to make an application for legal aid under the ‘Exceptional Funding’ scheme. This provides legal aid for complicated cases. As deportation is a very complicated area of law, it is worth making an application for exceptional funding. You do not need a lawyer to make the application.

The BID factsheet 'Exceptional Funding—Applying for Legal Aid in Deportation Cases: A Guide for Individuals' explains how you can make an application. The factsheet is available on the BID website: www.biduk.org

If I do have a right of appeal against a decision to deport me can I stay in the UK while I appeal?

The Home Office can 'certify' a decision under regulation 33 of the EEA regulations 2016. If your case is certified, this means that you can lodge your appeal in the UK but can be removed from the UK at any time before your appeal is finally decided by the Immigration and Asylum Chamber. The Notice of Decision to Deport will state, usually towards the end of the letter, whether the decision has been certified.

BID also has a factsheet on how to challenge certification under regulation 33. This is available on the BID website. It provides more detailed guidance on how to use the Supreme Court case of 'Kiarie & Byndloss' to challenge certification and is titled Deportation Appeals—Challenging the Home Office decision to deport you before you can appeal (certification under EEA Regulation 33)

Can I challenge a decision to refuse me the right to stay in the UK while I appeal?

The Home Office can only certify a case if removal during the appeal period would not result in a breach of human rights.

The courts have provided guidance on the factors that the Home Office should take into account when deciding whether to certify a case. For example: whether you have family in the UK, particularly minor children that would be affected by your removal during the appeal period; whether you have family in your country of origin, your age and state of health and the level of risk of reoffending. However, the recent Supreme Court case of Kiarie & Byndloss v SSHD [2017] UKSC 42 found that removing a person from the UK before the appeal was heard unfairly placed obstacles in the way of effectively preparing the appeal. In particular, the Court noted that removal from the UK before an appeal is heard makes it very difficult to:

- Gather the necessary evidence of length of residence in the UK and of integration into British society;
- Gather the necessary evidence of the strength of family life in the UK. In particular, it would not be possible to obtain expert reports such as an Independent Social Work report to comment on the relationship between the individual and their children because the expert would need to be able to observe them with the children;
- Obtain expert evidence on the risk of re-offending, such as a Forensic Psychologist report. This is because the individual would need to be present in the UK for the assessment by the expert to take place for the report to have any real weight as evidence

If your case is certified, you should write to the Home Office explaining all the reasons why your case should not be certified and asking that the certificate be cancelled. You should refer to the Supreme Court case of Kiarie & Byndloss. If the Home Office refuses to cancel the certificate, the only legal avenue will be to apply for Judicial Review.

BID's Factsheet on challenging Certification under Reg.33 contains a 'model letter' that you can use to write to the Home Office to request that the certificate is withdrawn. This can be found on our website www.biduk.org.

Will I be able to come back to the UK to make submissions in person at my hearing?

If you are an EU/EEA national or a non EEA National family member who is being deported under the EEA regulations, and you lodged your appeal within the correct time limits, you should refer to the advice above regarding the Kiarie & Byndloss case. If you have been removed from the UK you can also apply from outside the UK to re-enter temporarily for the purpose of making submissions in person in your appeal hearing. The Home Office 'Decision to make a Deportation Order' letter will tell you how you can do this. However:

- You will only be able to make the application for temporary return once you have a date for your appeal hearing.
- You will be held in immigration detention or in prison if you were deported under the Early Removal Scheme.

The Supreme Court found that the person who is appealing should be able to give evidence at their appeal. It found that:

- ◇ Evidence in person is more valuable to the court than evidence by video link;
- ◇ A video link may not be generally available and may be very difficult to arrange.
- ◇ Denial of entry could therefore be challenged through the legal process of judicial review on the grounds that this would prevent a person from having a fair hearing.

Please be aware that the Kiarie & Byndloss case is likely to have a major impact on how the Home Office operates out of country appeals if these are continued at all. Please seek legal advice for the most up to date information regarding out of country appeals.

How long does a Deportation Order last?

Under the 2016 EEA regulations, a Deportation Order remains in force until it is revoked or 'cancelled' by the Home Office or for the period specified in the order (Reg. 34 (2)). A person can apply to the Home Office for the Deportation Order to be 'revoked' on the basis that there has been a material change in the person's circumstances since the Order was made. However, such an application can only be made once the person is outside the UK (Reg.34(4)). Once an application is received by the Home Office, a decision must be made within 6 months.

If you are still in the UK and there has been a material change in your circumstances since the Home Office Decision to Deport or since the Court finally refused your case, you can make a fresh human rights application and request the cancellation of the Deportation Order based on your Article 8 right to respect for family life and private life.

The EEA regulations 2016 state that such an application can only be made from outside the UK (Reg.34 (4)). However, it is arguable that the presence of the person outside the UK is unlawful. If you wish to make an application to revoke your Deportation Order under the EEA regulations, we would advise you to seek legal advice.

KEEPING RECORDS

1. Keep a record of all phone calls & conversations you have with the Home Office, your offender manager/supervisor, and probation services

- Every time you have a telephone conversation with your offender manager/supervisor, probation services, the Offender Management Unit in your prison, or a Home Office official you should write down what you talked about, the questions that you were asked, and the answers that you gave.
- Try to get the name and job title of the person you spoke to and write that down too, and put the day of the week, the date and the time as well. You should ask for their name at the start of the conversation.
- If the telephone conversation does not go well, or you hear something you don't like, you should keep calm and try not to get angry. When the phone call is finished write down as much as you can remember of what was said. You will then have a record of discussions that will help you to remember what was said, and which can be used as evidence in court.

2. Keep all notes you send and receive from your Offender Manager/Supervisor or Home Office caseowner

- Every time you send a request to your offender manager or Home Office caseowner, make sure that you keep all your notes and their written responses. If they don't respond to one of your requests you should make a note on a piece of paper and keep the note.
- You will then have a record of your requests for information and help. This will help you to remember what was said, and you can use your notes as evidence in court.

3. Get proof of posting when sending letters and faxes

If you write letters or send a fax to try to obtain information you should:

- Keep a copy of the letter you sent and make a note on the copy of the date you sent it to be posted.
- Try to get 'proof of posting' from the Post Office so that you can prove to the Home Office or the court or tribunal that you have written the letter. If you are detained and have a visitor from the visitors' group at your IRC or prison you could ask them if they will help you with this, but not all groups will be able to help with this.
